REPORT.

To the Honorable the Select and Common Councils of the City of Philadelphia:

The Directors of Girard College respectfully present their Annual Report for the year 1869; and, in rendering an account of their stewardship, they feel bound, in the first place, to acknowledge the kindness of a gracious Providence in watching over the inmates of the Institution, blessing them with unusual health, and preserving them from sickness, accident and harm. But one death has occurred out of a population numbering on an average nearly five hundred, and that too, composed of a large proportion of those, who at the same age in our own city and elsewhere, are peculiarly liable to the diseases incident to early life, and which frequently end fatally. Much of this healthfulness is, without doubt, to be attributed to the exercises and recreations in which all the pupils freely engage out of school hours, and to the pure air which they breathe, whilst the plain but nutritious and wholesome food with which they are served, and an absence of the delicacies of the table, and confectionaries so injudiciously given elsewhere to those of the same age, contribute, in a large degree, to maintain them in vigor and in the full enjoyment of a good bodily condition. Cleanliness is enforced upon them by a daily attention in this respect, to their persons, whilst the frequent use of the bath is insisted upon as a necessary adjunct in attaining this end. During the present year, the pond on the College grounds has been cleansed and rendered fit for a bathing place in summer, whilst two large bathing pools have been constructed in the basement of the building used for the section-rooms, sufficiently deep and capacious to allow the boys to swim, and yet not too deep to be dangerous; so that now all our pupils can indulge in a luxury unknown even in the houses of the rich, and only to be enjoyed at great expense for a few months during the summer in the swimming schools of our city. These bathing pools are intended for use in the winter as well as during the warm months of the year, the water being heated by the steam which the escape pipe of a steam engine freely dispenses. Our boys, like all boys, love to play, and sometimes as a result their clothes and persons become soiled and dirty, and whilst in this condition, they may not appear to a casual observer as well conditioned as we could desire, but it is the result of carelessness and frivolity incident to youth which the quickly succeeding ablutions will not fail to eradicate.

As a matter connected with the cleanliness of our pupils, it may be remarked that a large earth closet, constructed on the newest and most approved principles, has been erected and in use on the premises for some time, and our experience in regard to its utility coincides with that of those, who have employed the same means for accomplishing the same purposes for which our own is employed.

It is a matter of no little pride when visitors to the College are asked to enter the infirmary, and the question is put before their entrance, how many inmates they expect to see there, to find that the number mentioned is largely in excess of those actually sick. Frequently not a single bed is occupied by a patient, whilst rarely not more than four or five out of a large population are to be found requiring medical assistance, or the attention of the kind Matron who has charge of that department.

The usual studies connected with the College course have been carefully pursued during the past year, embracing the elements of a sound and excellent education, and one which can render its recipients able in after life, to cope successfully with others, following the same pursuits and avocations as those which shall then engage their attention. Of course, the opportunities thus presented are not embraced with equal avidity, or with the same results by all to whom they are presented, yet gratifying examples are afforded from time to time to prove, that they are appreciated by many, whilst many of our graduates have risen to stations of eminence and usefulness as well in the learned professions as in business and the mechanic arts, upon the educational foundations here well and substantially laid. And in this connection it may be observed as a slight indication of the general good character of our graduates, that although the system of apprenticeship has almost become obsolete, yet we have thus far found no lack of employers willing to take our pupils, as soon as it becomes necessary under the Will of Mr. Girard to bind them out.

We have great pleasure, too, in reporting the discipline of the College as in a good condition. Of course, among so large a number of boys, many will be found impatient of restraint, disorderly, vicious, and subjects for vigorous treatment, yet the great majority are well behaved and orderly. The necessary restraints of the College, imposed by Mr. Girard's Will, are in themselves unfavorable to some degree to the maintenance of discipline. Kept within limited bounds, not suffered to mix with comrades out of doors, and with but little to vary the monotony of each day's employment, there is sometimes danger in combinations to resist the lawful authority of the officers of the Institution, arising from mischievous motives, sometimes from outside influences, and sometimes from mere wantonness, yet taking everything into consideration, there is no greater amount of insubordination, crime or vice manifested in our midst than what might be anticipated from so large a number of boys and young men, all of whom are immature, and including many whose early surroundings have not been favorable to the formation of a good character. It was gratifying to notice in a late distribution of prizes for excellence in studies and deportment, that the names of two or three were mentioned against whom, during the past year, not a single demerit mark had been entered, and of a large number who by their excellent conduct and behavior, were deemed worthy of special approbation, and the recipients of suitable gifts as rewards of merit for these excellent traits of character. The generous and hearty applause bestowed by their fellow-pupils upon some whose names were mentioned with honorable distinction, taught the great truth, that even in early life correctness of deportment, and firmness of purpose, make a powerful impression upon others by whom they are surrounded, or upon whom their influence is exerted.

One new feature has been, as we believe, successfully introduced into our College training during the year that has past, that has added greatly to the discipline of the College, and exerted a highly beneficial influence upon it. We allude to the formation of military companies among the boys, who are regularly drilled and taught the manual of arms, and who have attained a degree of perfection, which is in the highest degree commendable and praiseworthy. It is considered by them an honor to belong to these organizations, and no severer punishment, or more salutary in its nature can be inflicted, than suspension from the ranks, or deprivation of the right to appear in the company on account of misconduct. The influence of this movement has been excellent in every respect, by imparting a new source of occupation and enjoyment, and by varying the monotony of the daily routine which needed something in the shape of a novel employment to relieve it. It may be mentioned as a matter of pleasant information, that during the past year it has not become necessary to punish any of the pupils by confinement or separation from the companionship of the others, and that the system of administering discipline in this shape, has not been used by the present head of the College since his last election to that office. Indeed, considering the material we have in charge, the results of a severe or mild treatment, appear to be about the same; delinquencies and misconduct of a like character being as prevalent under the one system as under the other, and such being the case, it is of course more pleasant to use a gentle exercise of discipline than that which may be called harsh and rigorous.

Amongst the novelties of the year, has been the institution and successful development of a brass band, composed of the pupils, who under the charge of an efficient teacher, are in a fair way of becoming quite proficient as musicians. Their instruction only commenced in January last, and they are now enabled to perform quite well and creditably, compositions of an advanced character upon their various instruments.

Both the military and the band appeared to great advantage in the ceremonies attendant upon the unveiling of the Monument erected upon the College grounds, in November last, to the memory of the graduates who fell during the late rebellion. Indeed, all the boys connected with the College, including the very youngest, afforded by their gentlemanly and decorous conduct, great satisfaction to the Board, as well as to the numerous visitors who were present on that interesting occasion. Whilst the band performed a solemn dirge, the military, advancing first with reversed arms, and followed by full and numerous ranks of the remainder of the pupils, marched slowly around the piece of ground in which the Monument is placed, presenting the picture of a small army, well disciplined and anxious to appear to the best advantage. We, as a Board, are not ashamed of the appearance of our lads, and on this occasion, they did credit and honor to the Institution with which they are connected.

The Monument referred to, stands to the west of the College, and is a work of art deserving great praise, being in complete harmony and keeping with the main structure. In the upper part, there is standing the marble figure of a young American soldier, bearing a familiar likeness to many whom we all have seen during our late national struggle, resting upon his musket and calmly surveying the scene before him. On the panels are engraven the names and the battle fields wherever they fell, of a large number of those once receiving their education here, who went forward at the call of their country, to die that she might live.

The ceremony of unveiling the Statue was preceded by a prayer in the Chapel, by the President of the College, followed by addresses from the Chairman of the Committee of arrangement, and two of the Alumni, one of whom is now a member of the Board, interspersed with appropriate anthems, executed by a chorus composed of ladies and gentlemen, who kindly, under the auspices of another Director, volunteered for the occasion, whilst the covering to the Monument and Statue was removed by the Mayor of the city, assisted by the Presidents of Select and Common Councils.

The history of the year would be incomplete without some reference to the spirited manner in which the birth-day of the Founder was celebrated on the 21st day of May, 1869. The Alumni entered into the proper observance of the day, with a determination to render the occasion remarkable, by the happy arrangement of suitable exercises, enlivened with excellent music, altogether making it the most remarkable and interesting anniversary ever held within the College walls. As our Alumni increase in numbers and age, their recollections of their former home seem to deepen and strengthen and to take a firmer possession of their hearts than ever. This was evinced by the large number who were present on the occasion referred to, not a few of whom were accompanied by their wives and children, to whom they doubtless pointed out the objects remembered by them as associated with the scenes of their early childhood, and ever indelibly impressed upon their memories.

The Board have no suggestions to make to your honorable bodies, except one in reference to the necessity existing for the erection, as soon as it can conveniently be done, of a suitable building for Chapel exercises, and for public exhibitions. During the year 48 were bound out to various trades—six were expelled, the indentures of four were cancelled, and one died, leaving at the close of the year 510 pupils in the College.

Returning to Councils our sincere thanks for the increased interest they have taken during the past year in the affairs and management of the College, and hoping that during the present year, the same kindly disposition may be cherished towards it, the Directors have the honor to tender this Annual Report.

CHARLES E. LEX,
President Pro. Tem.

APPENDIX.

Prayer and Addresses delivered at the Girard College, Wednesday, November 24th, 1869, on the occasion of unveiling the Monument erected to the memory of former Pupils, who fell in the recent contest for the preservation of the American Union.

PRAYER BY PRESIDENT ALLEN.

Almighty God, Thou Source of wisdom, and light, and strength, Thou Giver of every good, we pray for Thy blessing on our proceedings this day, and on all who participate in them.

While the Monument which we are about to unveil, commemorates the patriotic services of the young men of this College who died that their country might live, let it also stand, a silent monitor, to remind the officers of the College of the solemn duty enjoined by the Founder, to form and foster in the minds of the orphans under their instruction a pure attachment to our republican institutions. Let it excite in the successive classes of youth who will go forth from these halls, a laudable ambition to serve their country with self-sacrificing fidelity whenever danger shall threaten her, in the full assurance that the names of those who fall in her defence, will not be permitted to fade from the memory of men.

Have compassion, we beseech Thee, on the kindred of our departed pupils, whose hopes lie buried with them in distant, and perhaps nameless graves. May their country's benediction cheer them in their bereavement, and let it be a source of consolation that their loved ones died nobly in a just cause, and gave not their lives in vain.

O Thou Ruler of nations, who governest all events by Thy providence, we pray Thee to hasten the time foreseen by holy men of old, when nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more. Repair the moral and material desolations which the recent war has wrought in our land; restore fraternal love between our States; let sectional animosities give place to the peaceful rivalries of industry; and the clash of arms be heard no more in all our borders.

Our trust, O God, is in Thee. Except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it. Except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh in vain. Do Thou, therefore, inspire our public men with love of justice and the fear of God, that they may work righteousness with clean hands and pure hearts, until virtue, truth, and freedom regulated by law shall make our nation a name and a praise in the whole earth. And when the sculptured stones which we dedicate to patriotic memories shall crumble to dust, may the Union which our Country's martyrs died to perpetuate, remain firm and indissoluble.

We commend to the guidance of Thy wisdom the President of the United States, the Governor of this Commonwealth, the Mayor and Councils of this City, and all in authority. We invoke Thy blessing on the Directors, Officers, Alumni and Pupils of this College; and do Thou bring us all, in Thine own good time, to our eternal rest in Heaven, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

ADDRESS of CHARLES E. LEX, Esq.

Mr. Mayor, Gentlemen of the Select and Common Councils, Ladies and Gentlemen:—Gathered together beneath the roof of this noble institution at the close of the day, while the shadows of the evening are falling around us, we are about to discharge a debt of gratitude to the illustrious dead, to whose memories a monument has been erected upon the grounds once trodden by their feet, and in sight of the edifice in which they were trained to perform the active duties of life. The time and surrounding circumstances are appropriate and suggestive of the solemn ceremonial in which we are soon to engage. The woods stripped of their foliage, the rustling leaves of autumn, the winds sighing through the lifeless branches of the trees, are all in harmony and keeping with the services of the day, and proclaim in mute, though expressive language, the story of man's mortality. With the wrecks of nature thus strewn around us, it might seem as though we were about merely to deplore their removal from life, and the rude snapping of the cords which bound them to their earthly existence. And such would be the case under ordinary circumstances. Such are the lessons taught us in every cemetery, as we see recorded on the pale marble the names of those who, full of vigor and manliness, have been summoned to the world of spirits. But a more imperishable story is connected with the memories of those whom this day it is our privilege to honor. For they were not cut down in life's early dawn by accident or disease, but bravely, joyfully, and steadfastly sought the patriot's death, and are entitled to the patriot's reward.

From the peaceful scenes which now surround us, we turn with reluctance to the story of the past, its excitements, its fears, its wishes, its hopes, its bloody encounters, and its triumphant success. But in reviewing the history of our recent struggle for a national existence, how many memories arise of great, chivalric and noble deeds of daring, how many recollections of self-sacrifice on the part of those who went fearlessly to the combat, and how many bitter regrets for the dead who perished on the field of battle! And yet we resigned them cheerfully and calmly into the hands of the God of armies, to whose keeping we committed them and the great principles for which they languished and died.

And this College, too, has furnished her proportion of these gallant men. From among those educated within these walls a noble band went forth to take their place in the ranks of the freemen who, with them, cheerfully devoted themselves for the salvation of our republic. Unused here to scenes of contention and strife, guarded carefully from outward tumult or the jarrings of the world, they nevertheless received in this place the lessons which made them patriots, and imbibed the determination of purpose and steadiness of will which prepared them when the time came for an entire dedication of themselves to their country's welfare. The benevolent founder of this College, in marking out the plan of education for its inmates, provided carefully in his will that they should above all things be taught to cherish a profound regard for our free institutions, and the monument which we are about to dedicate will ever prove how carefully his injunctions have been here fulfilled. These teachings they carried with them into life; and at the first signal of danger rushed forward to take their places in the columns of our army and afterwards did their duty bravely as became the soldiers of the republic. They were orphans, it is true, deprived of a father's watchful care, but they looked upon their native land with filial affection, and, as loyal sons of the government, put forth their noblest efforts in behalf of freedom and right.

And who does not recollect the first cry of danger? Who does not remember the awful, the almost oppressive stillness which pervaded the whole country, as the storm was seen gathering on the political horizon—a storm so soon destined to burst over our devoted land in anger and wrath? How many efforts were made to keep back the crisis! How men shrank from meeting the responsibilities so soon to devolve upon them! How it was hoped that, after all, opposing passions would be cooled down, and reason once more assert her sway! How many ardent prayers were uttered that God would avert the dreaded catastrophe! But all was in vain. Slowly and reluctantly we yielded to the force of circumstances, and then saw our land given over to the horrors of civil war.

And who cannot recall the eventful day when the portentous silence of which we have spoken was broken. For when the fatal blow was struck and our country's flag was exposed to insult, thousands upon thousands presented themselves to avenge the wrong and to repel indignantly the attempted disgrace. Then the patriot's heart swelled with emotion. Then the starry emblem of our nation's honor was flung to the breeze from every window and dwelling and public edifice, accompanied with shouts of defiance and of a strong determination that it should continue to float over a free and united people. This purpose was steadily maintained throughout the struggle.

Soon the rattle of the drum was heard, calling forth the chivalric and brave to the rescue, and the ranks of our army were filled as though by magic. But with what varied results was the contest maintained. We of the North had much to discourage us. Our misguided brethren were full of zeal and restless activity. They summoned all the fiery impulses generated beneath a Southern sky to their assistance. They were commanded by able leaders. They contended with a valor worthy of a better cause. Europe was not merely indifferent, but active in their behalf. Almost the whole world was against us, and we were compelled to battle not only with our foes at home, but with bitter enemies abroad. Reverse succeeded reverse, until the hearts of many grew sick with disappointment. The issue for a long time was doubtful. At length the backbone of the Rebellion was broken upon our own soil, upon the soil of our own good Pennsylvania, under the leadership of our own gallant Meade, who, at Gettysburg stayed the progress of the hostile bands, and first gave us the promise of a bright future. And yet after this the ultimate decision was long delayed, until, at once, and almost unexpectedly, the fearful contest came quickly to its conclusion, and peace was restored to our afflicted country. Patience, fortitude and perseverance conquered in the end, and glorious have been their results.

Let us never cease to remember the noble men who achieved the victory. It is true that to conspicuous names among them the highest honors have been accorded; but let us not ignore the common soldiers, without whose presence and aid such great results would never have been accomplished; for they fought from the purest motives and at great sacrifices. They were not, in the vast majority of instances, mercenaries, selling themselves for a stipulated price, but were men actuated by duty, impelled by a sacred love of country, with strong affections for our republican institutions, feeling there was no safety for us in the future except in preserving the Union of these United States.

And such men we are assembled this day to honor. We revere their memories, not because they ought to be commemorated more than others who were engaged in the same noble conflict (for which just such materials as these was the rank and file of our army filled; men of whom it has been justly said that in most instances they were superior in intellect and standing to many of the lower grades of officers by whom they were commanded), but because we knew them—knew, too, the motives which actuated them—knew their individual excellencies and worth, and because their bright example may stimulate others, should a similar necessity arise either against a foreign or a domestic foe, to emulate their gallant deeds and follow their noble footsteps. In fancy we can see them listening to their country's call and determining to devote themselves to her service. We can see them laying aside their garments as civilians and assuming the national uniform. We can see them standing in the ranks with their bright, cheerful, and hopeful faces flushed with patriotic ardor, yet calm and earnest and determined in their purpose.

We then follow them into the army, its active duties and labors. We behold them now wearied and foot-sore with the long and tiresome march, now standing as sentinels at their posts during the silent night, watching intently the faintest notes of danger or alarm. Again firm and unflinching and undismayed, while the shot and shell are rattling around them; then, when we next see them, they are leaping forward with exultant shouts to storm some strongly fortified citadel. And soon we trace them from danger to danger, sometimes in the hospital, and in the horrid prison pens of the South, until at length, bleeding and dying, or sick, they lay down their lives on behalf of their country. Battle-field after battle-field beheld their valor, while each scene of conflict contains their graves, and in every grave there rests a hero.

May we not presume that they imbibed the spirit of the founder of this college, who manfully and resolutely faced death in its most terrific form, as in the hospital filled with pestilence and disease, he, with a noble band of others, amid a panic stricken community, administered to the wants of the sick and dying with a persistent and manly courage. Peace be to their ashes! May no rude hand disturb their remains wherever they may repose, or a nation fail to deplore their loss, or to commemorate their virtues.

Gentlemen of the Select and Common Council, we are about this day to unveil the monument which you, in a commendable spirit, have sanctioned by appropriating the means for its erection to the memories of those great men. As you look upon it to-day, and see inscribed upon its panels the names of some who once were pupils here and have so well discharged their duty, you will recognize the fact that the city of Philadelphia has not been unmindful of the confidence reposed in her, or derelict in the discharge of the trust committed to her keeping.

Alumni of this College—This monument is erected to record the patriotism and virtues of those who were fellow-companions with you here, in this your cherished home, towards which, however prosperous the world may have made you, you still turn with feelings of undiminished attachment and affection. Your names may not go down to posterity like those whose virtues we are recording to-day, but I pray you to remember—and indeed we should all remember—that the responsibilities of life after all devolve upon individuals who separately and singly form the community, and not upon those to whom the charge of government is committed, or who are responsible for its administration. For each man in his own sphere is either imparting a proper tone and sentiment to those by whom he is surrounded, or he is exercising upon them a pernicious and destructive influence. But very few rise to an historical importance, or have their names prominently inscribed upon the national records. To the masses is confided the task of carrying out the great purposes of government; and just as the common people are virtuous, brave, intelligent and educated, so may we count upon the prosperity of our free institutions and the permanency of our political fabric.

Shoulder to shoulder, then, gentlemen, tread the pathway of life and fight its battles. Discharge faithfully, earnestly, and conscientiously the duties of your various callings, and though no monument may be erected over your mortal remains to record your well-deserved praises, the force of your example will be felt by others, and thus your good deeds be perpetuated from generation to generation.

To my friends the honored President of the college and his corps of faithful colaborers and assistants, this monument will speak in words of approval and encouragement. Here you may see the results of your teachings, your instruction, your advice. Persevere, then, in the future as you have in the past. I know your task is difficult and arduous, that frequently your efforts are not appreciated, that you are sometimes disheartened and feel almost ready to shrink from the further discharge of your duties, but depend upon it the future will compensate for the labors of the past, and as the ranks of those who have left these walls are daily increasing in number, you will find many of them reflecting credit upon you in return for your present efforts, and grateful in the recollection of your guidance and assistance.

And to the present pupils of this college I would say, as you look upon this monument, remember that it is erected to record the memories and brilliant achievements of those who were members of the same household in which you are now numbered. Let it incite you to diligence and perseverance, to correct deportment, to ready obedience, to cheerful submission to the lawful commands of those who are over you, to a firm resolution that your future course in life shall be honorable and upright, coupled with a faithful and zealous preparation for its active and pressing duties. Soon you will gaze upon the chiseled representation of one of the boys in blue who went forth from among you, and nobly discharged his duty. Through the long wintry nights he will stand silently at his post watching the fleecy snow descend in quietness and peace over the surrounding landscape. In the midst of summer he will be there when the air is hushed and calm, while the silver moonlight plays around his marble form, or when the storm shall burst upon him in its fury, and the forked lightning, with its lurid glare, reveals him quietly resting upon his musket. He cannot leave his position. Let it teach you fidelity to your duties, and unflinching integrity in their performance. Remember the Boy-in-Blue, for he will ever continue at his post watching you.

ADDRESS of D. KANE O'DONNELL, Esq.

Friends:—Our dead are with us. Called by this high occasion, they revisit their youth. But now our true senators and fathers, they shall give us benediction, for death, the great age, and sacrifice, the great experience have made them venerable. Not we so much honor them as they honor us. Passion perishes, the outcry of slaughter ceases, the smoke of battle vanishes, and leave, let us trust, the immortal and beneficent soul serene. So, let us greet our heroes, remembering, with the poet, it is only death that dies. This temple of charity, this family and friendship of ours, this monument newly dedicated, cry out against their cutting off. The place we knew the memories and hopes we shared, the breathing world itself, resist the thought that they have altogether perished. More living than the green earth may seem to us the inspiration of their lives, stronger than monuments the adamant of the truth that underlies and surpasses all fame; grander than the price of cities, the pomp of governments, the thunder of war—the destiny of the humblest soul.

But we are sensible, indeed, that those we honor have in some manner ceased to be. For them no more are the auroral pleasures which thrill in the blood of youth, the poetry of genial seasons which can kindle gladness even in aged eyes; no longer the crowded game, the laborious pastime of splendid but terrible life, the illusion and the discipline of earthly endeavor. When last they saw nature her birds whistled them to the field and her skies shone like a banner. They trod the daisy under foot, and alas! the beautiful earth was wet with their blood. Theirs was no child's play, though children shall gambol where they fell, though beauty shall flourish where their mourners wept, to remind us how the garden of Eden has become a battle-field, and how, with as strange meaning as Mahomet's, Paradise is indeed under the shadow of swords. In the day of their strife nature seemed but the background to one lamentable tragedy, and friends and kindred the helpless spectators of the scene. What brother's arm should bear the fallen? What matron hearts should nurse them? What infirmary should heal the great, gaping wound of Death itself? What should make laurels green to blind eyes? What should make whole our crippled victories, our shattered successes, our triumphs with half a leg? Verily our fate is hard; verily our trial is sore, and not but in agony is steeped the purple of heroes. Mercifully are our spirits "subdued to what they work in," the toiler limited in his tasks, the fighter in his lists; else what enterprises would turn awry; what cowards and unthrifths we should be? But, wide as our planet is, it has only room for a purpose, and with all its magnificence, celebrates nothing more tenderly than sacrifice.

Yet that sacrifice may be awful. Death has no end of weapons and of tortures, and claims all victims, all surrenders. The power and ingenuity of pain may well alarm the conscience. Bayonet-wounds and sword-strokes; instruments that pierce and carve the writhing patient; machines such as that which seized our good schoolfellow's arm, and hung him up in agony till caught in the arms of mercy; these give terrible teachings. Think, too, of that horrible nausea of the yellow pestilence, of the unfathomed misery of chronic sufferers, of the calamity of all disease. Consider the pangs of sudden assassination and catastrophe; the explosions which make as little of men's anatomies as of so many splinters and straws; the fright and wounds of those who, in an hour of that periodic madness which falls upon the proudest calculations of enterprise, are precipitated unto death. Fearful, likewise, are those deluges which sweep away human waifs: the tempest at sea in which ships are engulfed and sucked down into the unknown world of water; the earthquake that mutinies against creation, and tosses man with contempt into the dust-hole; the pell-mell mangling of bodies in battle; the fierce cannon-shot that carries away limbs, or tears out bowels and brain; all circumstances of the Promethean fate, wherein the disgusting vulture is not wanting. But anguish of the heart, the expiation of pride and greed, the smothering of the soul under riches, the vital cost of self-willed blunders, and the manifold pains and penances of the spirit; these, too, belong to the great drama of sacrifice; hinting to us of hell and purgatory, and heaven, out of one solemn apocalyptic book of life. Pain opens to us the wilds of eternity and fixes our quarters in the campaign of the skies. "What new war is this? Into what unknown lists do we enter?" All the elements of Titanic trial, old as the globe and common as man, iteration has made tame to us. The wounded and those who bind up the wounds attain a common hardihood. The surgeon has a grim cheerfulness, and the patient accepts him as a portion of his disease. The private convict bears his burden equally with him condemned to hard labor; the sentence for life or death is executed no less secretly than openly, and in either case is measured; our drama is for the closet as well as the stage, and the ungibbeted conscience meets its doom. The sinner is condemned to be a saint, and men are put to the rack for not being happy. Solomon's genii at work upon the temple were never so spell-bound as that mute myriad of slaves who daily and unwillingly build the house of fate and of God. The freemasonry of sufferers have agreed to silence, for, indeed, they know not what to say or what to make of themselves, or have profound and inexplicable consolations; and society smiles and suffers, yea, murders, while it smiles. To sublimer spectators this painful drama may be but a divine comedy; but assuredly our tragedy is near at hand, with no lack of cap and bells to help out its Shakspearean universality. Now, if a selfish zeal for justice, though it bring down heaven on one's head, dig out of the poet's grave a terrible doubt, to show us of what manner of corruption our wretched but beautiful Titan was made, still shall we fear to despair that one great heart shall equally contain the sinner who could do right, and the saint who could do wrong. Should the coolest lover of nature, breathing her health, condemn the selfishness of human suffering, still is Nature herself a great sufferer; still is selfishness the one thing to be redeemed; still is redemption the one great work, Well for us that the ensign of divine passions surmounts the strife, and that there is victory for the victim. Highest boon for noblest duty—this seems to be the golden balance in which we are weighed and found wanting. Not one syllable of trial can be spared to make man a god; the humblest of us cannot escape the grandeur or the peril of his fate. We cannot erect the temple of the spirit out of appetite and money. We are not to be speculated upon; and though the market be forestalled by gamblers, no man can cheat with the eternal stake and escape. So, let the world trade upon its graves; let humanity for a moment forget its toilers and martyrs; let bronze mammon stare itself out of countenance, and let us erect altars to the Baal of the steam engine; let our dead braves be heaped up in statistics and lost; still shall none escape the final due which every one must render to courage and truth, either as servant or as slave.

Now and here it is specially proper that we should venerate the fortune and misfortune of death; for we stand, as it were, by the graves of brave men with whose bloody toil we had more than general sympathy. Fitting it is that we here realize our mortal fellowship. For all of us is one poem, this of nature; one epos, this of life; one commonplace tragedy, this of death. But they who fought and fell for us at Gettysburg and Antietam, and in the Virginian battles are peculiarly epical to us, for they strove for man against men, and tested life for us, to make it braver. They "marshal us the way that we should go." Yet we ask ourselves what have they gained, what have we gained in the struggle, since there were wounds, since here are dust and ashes. Less, perhaps, than they imagine who cheered the wrath and forgot the agony; less than our stormiest reformers could calculate, seeing how our best and bravest were slain, and how many of the ransomed perished in the victory; less than they can know who vainly ascribe to men what in one way or other defeated the efforts of all men, yet vindicated the truth at last, when a cause had nigh given way under the failure of prophets and warriors; less, and perhaps more; but only to be determined in the fine balance of heaven; enough, at all events to strike off certain chains, to try.

pride, to prove manhood, to give us this monument, and all the meaning of its honorable names. Servants and warriors of invisible powers, they could not reckon out the means or the end; but they rallied to their standard and stood by their guns. Would that we, too, could obey the high behest, and find such magic in resolve that no scourge of fire should be needed to make soldiers of us; that in most solitary places and among strange enemies and in the isolation of the soul a brave yet humble heart might make home for us; that the sea at its highest should be but as a cradle to the faithful mind; that we might have heroic mischance, and that with souls to await disaster, death might fail and not we. In the appearances and in the imaginations of life spectres and devils and angels seem to try the spirits of men. They come from the storm of life, and out of the avenging beauty of the universe, and the hero may put his goblin to flight and quell his demon, but who shall wrestle with the more terrible messengers of heaven—with you, ye pitying angels who strike men half dead with celestial illusions, yet right well know the charm that shall change their agonies to bliss. Be kind, then, to them who fell; make good their dream and purpose; forgive the anger of the war; consecrate the hell of the battle; and give peace to our slain.

Not now could we fail to deeply respect the truth that they whose monument we uncover fought for country and for freedom, shadows of the imagined Heaven where country is Paradise, where freedom is immortality, and where leadership is God. But had their fate given us no better text than of lives lost in a partisan struggle, we should not be here. Were all we celebrate but the fact that they suffered in the police duty of saving life and property, we might not commend to ourselves the lesson of this noble hour. What keeps war from being a great baby-game of murder save the thought we bring to this commemoration? However our brethren reached that end which we glorify now; by what process of circumstances they came to offer up life in our behalf for a soldier's pay; by what inspiration they fell under the flag, we stop not to inquire. By devious and unforeseen ways they were brought like the mightiest of the earth to realize the earnestness and the sacredness of life and death. Heaven, let us trust, made them its instruments, and when they fell to die it was like old Antæus to gather strength from their fall and rise again. Their simple courage was not known in general orders or in politics; they were unrenowned in yellow-covers with theatrical champions, heaven-born pirates, and the rest. They were toilers as they were soldiers; theirs were work-a-day romances, and at last they faced the deadliest matter-of-fact; but they knew the use of better weapons than Vulcan's, and heavier artillery than Mars'. As their effort celebrated the common manhood, so we rear this memorial to the rank and file, and the sons of the poor. Sacred be their memories that so rise above the calculations of warfare, when valor and glory were numbers, and duty and sympathy arithmetic, and when sometimes in vain-glory our braves were thrown away. Sacred be their memories here gathered and monumented not to die. Blest be their sacrifice, precious their example, to teach our younger brethren that in the world beyond these walls there is a nobler apprenticeship than that of trade, and that the uncommercial journey of high honor, to speak the words of Sir Philip Sidney, lieth not in smooth ways.

Written in fiery Scriptures the valor of the battle may well instruct our untried natures, but did we not see the nobler gospel and comprehend that war is, after all, but a terrible plea for peace, the battle would be in vain. That is a golden learning surpassing all education, to love one's neighbor as one's self, so that were he white or black, rich or poor, his cause should seem to us our own. Self is pitted against self, and in the flashes of struggle this divine truth shines out tested in the fire of the passions of men. A craven peace would, indeed, seem but as war, "the viler as underhand;" but war itself, what is it to thinking men unless it teach us peace and pardon? Heroes are to be admired for the innocence of the cause in which they draw their weapons: he strives best who needs to strive least; and, perhaps, in the abstract the worst business in which brave men can engage is to fight. The high science of courage has ever been to shun wrong and violence; the true championship, duty, whether it take us to ignominy or bring us to that which in strict truth should be "the last infirmity of the noble minds," fame. There is that in heroic charity which melts all the crucibles, solves all battles, resolves all enterprises, and against which power though it dazzles, is a coward, and wit, though it be trenchant, is not brave. Let Cæsar envy the humblest grave, and Swift beg the fate of the poorest of well-doing clodpolls. It is only royal to be pure, and to be pure is to be strong. Our giant has strength, not for Baresark wrath to root up forests and strangle his neighbor, but that he may be able to save his temper, and not deface Heaven's premises or mutilate his soul. Our sage has only knowledge to be humble, wisdom to be meek; our hero, only courage, as it were to work out his salvation with fear and trembling. Food and drink, and the thousand good things of earth seem to have been given us for the education and use of the virtues. The battle roars in our ears only to tell us, in the face of brute sacrifice, that thrice welcome, thrice blessed are the peacemakers. Thus may eagle and serpent alike do homage to the dove. But surely there are occasions when it is better to fight than to eat, and times for manhood to die, when, as one of our philosophers has said, it is better not to live. "A man who fears," said John Brown of Ossawattomie, "is born out of time." The patience and faith of the saints must have in them some consolation for those fighters who have celestial speculation in their eyes. If, as the ancients said, no death exists for the good, the hero may add that only to be base is to cease, only to be cowardly is to perish. We can scarcely teach our juniors these starry truths, we who know them so ill; but let us try. Astronomy, and chemistry, and mathematics, do, with all their problems, but contain a simple science of self-knowledge to show the rich that he is poor, the strong that he is weak, and that men and men are one. Simpler maxims than theirs learned by heart may serve to make us feel what the heavens mean, and why this brave miracle of living. The lives of men are scattered and sown in myriad graves; but the stars are lavishly poured over the sky, and the singing constellations cease not to shine. Always is the hopeful lesson of the infinite to the finite, while the grave angels of duty call us away from the syrens of the illusions; bid us look up after the bloody mist of battles is swept away, and behold the calm but not unmeaning heaven whose peace surpasseth understanding; bid us take heart from every struggle well endured, and imitate the cheerful service of nature. We might teach this and more—that life is better than meat, and the soul than raiment; that every act of our career is of spiritual and august meaning; that we grow not unless our very food be temperance and patience. Some one said that the hero daily eats his own heart, lives upon his courage; a maxim which reminds us with what courageous belief the old saints ate what they deemed the body of God. But to pamper our children with ambition, to amuse them with the romance of violence, to show them the pride of war without its surpassing anguish, to teach them desire without true purpose, and courage without love—this dishonors our heroes, and makes death vain.

Now we dedicate this monument which the bounteous fatherhood of the city has erected to the memory of its children and our brethren, who lost their lives in precious sacrifice for that freedom we now enjoy, and for that emancipation of humble men whose joyous deliverance our own unshackled souls can now feel. Thank God for what they have won! Heaven bless all they have suffered! This impressive stone shall remain forever a portion of the memory, and the beauty, and the glory of our college. It shall point an undying example to the children of Girard; it shall be another monument to his bounty; for, though, indeed, death in youth, and in battle be most melancholy, our affections, our gratitude, our solemn purpose, our steadfast faith shall yet hallow all. Let us not despair, though our brethren have fallen from us, and though this monument seems for a moment vain to the death they die. Not to death, O friends, but to immortality, do we raise the signal in our hearts and the monument on earth. Not to this narrow space do we restrict our offering, but we give it to the brotherhood of souls. Not in self-flattery let us devote it, but in reverence of that Power “who maketh the country of the earth and of the sky one republic.”

“ Though fallen on stricken fields they lie,
Or blacken on the gallows-tree,
Freedom thy dead can never die
Because they died for thee.”

ADDRESS OF WILLIAM E. LITTLETON, ESQ.

Ladies and Gentlemen:—After the addresses to which we have all listened with so much pleasure, you will neither expect or desire that I should detain you with any extended remarks. This I know full well, and not even the interest of the occasion shall tempt me to trespass unduly upon your patience or indulgence.

The duty devolved upon us to-day bears a twofold character; it is sad, because to those of us who are graduates of the college it vividly recalls recollections of brothers departed; and yet it is not altogether sorrowful, for we come to honor their memory for their heroic courage in the great struggle so recently ended.

What community in the loyal North but has its honored dead who fell, as our brothers did, battling for the good cause; and what community but desires, in some lasting way, to express its great love for the brave men who have so nobly fallen? Halls and monuments are rising throughout the land to perpetuate their memories; and their names, their courage and their sad yet noble fate shall never be forgotten.

We too have our departed ones, and to their memory has been erected the statue before you, and on its base, as you have already learned, are written the names of the graduates of the college who were killed during the war, or died from disease then contracted or wounds received in battle.

Where stands the marble figure which commemorates their virtues, they and we in earlier days played in the happy innocence of childhood—their voices and ours echoed and re-echoed around this same spot—o'er these grounds we and they, "dear playmates of the olden time," heedless of the great world beyond, with ball and bat, with shout and halloo, roamed free and joyous, blessed with a happiness as great as earth could give, or Heaven dare permit. We never thought of wars or their desolations. We never dreamed that any of us should take part in them. Shut out from the world, what had we to do with its great questions or great evils? You, men of older growth, governed and controlled it. We knew but little of it, and contented here in this our home, our world, time sped on until the hour came for us to leave it. And then, a few short years, and the great contest began.

You know its story well! How doubtful at first seemed the result! Those early defeats, who does not recollect them? How the national heart ached with agony as there came disaster upon disaster, and brave men went down by thousands, and the wounded were scattered all over the land. But no true heart despaired, and sure victory came at last.

We must still think of the days of Bull Run and like disasters, for we cannot banish memory at will; but there came, thank God, in later time, for happier recollection, such days as those of Gettysburg, where on Pennsylvania soil and under Pennsylvania's general, the army of the republic gave the rebellion its death blow.

In the great crisis which thus came upon us, the graduates of Girard College were not backward. More than a third of their then number enlisted in the army. The boy who in early youth almost timidly left its protecting walls, in manhood fearlessly shouldered the musket, and marched with the brave and true, fighting valiantly in his country's cause. Some are with us yet,—others fell, nobly dying that the Government might not perish. Theirs has indeed been the patriot's death. We who survive them shall never greet again their manly forms. Of some, we only know that this or that one fell in battle, that others perished amidst the horrors of Andersonville or Belle Isle. And so the sad story runs on. No grave-stone marks the spot where rest their last remains; no hand of affection shall strew flowers upon their untimely graves, and these, the places of their childhood, shall know them never again forever.

But though dead, their memories shall not perish, and through all time, whilst stands this noble edifice or yonder monument which we have erected, shall the world learn of their courage and their patriotism. And so long as there shall exist a graduate of Girard College, their names and their brave deeds shall be kept in dearest recollection, for we who knew them in the days gone by, you who have succeeded us, and they in turn who shall come after you, will always revere the memories of those of our number who have so nobly died. Year after year, as we gather here, as in our custom, to honor the memory of Stephen Girard, shall we all unite in homage to our departed brothers, and as we stand before that statue, with the recollections of the past and youth's hallowed associations crowding upon us, shall we always give to them our dearest, choicest thoughts.

May the monument which we this day dedicate to them, forever stand. There, in its appropriate place, under the protecting shadows of this and yonder building, may it last till time shall be no more, ever teaching the world that the will of the founder was faithfully kept, and that the inmates of his college were taught that "love of country" which he enjoined, and which enabled them to die in its defence. And by it may the pupils of the institution ever have before them the patriotic example of those of their predecessors whose memories it seeks to perpetuate, making it as well a lesson to the living as a memorial to the dead. Then, indeed, shall all feel that it has not been built in vain.

We are told in ancient story of a sculptor, who fell in love with the image which his own hands had created, and that he breathed into it the breath of life and it became a living being. And as we, the graduates of this college, having already so much in everything that meets us here to kindle the imagination and warm the heart, shall, with the added ardor of a deepened patriotism, gaze upon this statue, beautiful in itself, still more beautiful in the object to which it is dedicated, it, too, like the statue of old, shall be imbued with life; no longer shall it remain but the marble image, cold and unsympathetic to the touch, but warmed and illumined by the love with which we shall regard it, become gifted with a vitality which shall in turn impart hope and encouragement to us, ever cheering us on to noble actions and courageous deeds.

And our prayer to-day is, that the spirit of patriotism thus invoked may ever abide in the statue which we now unveil, making it for all time to come a shrine where all may kneel, and from which none shall depart without renewed strength and courage for all the battles of life,

The Hallelujah Chorus was then sung, after which the chapel was vacated, and the assemblage took up a position in front of the monument. The college band played a dirge, the cadets and students drew up in line, and Mayor Fox, assisted by the Presidents of Select and Common Council, unveiled the sculptor's work.

The monument above referred to, was constructed by Mr. Wm. Struthers & Sons, of Philadelphia, at a cost of $6,000. It consists of a base of Ohio sand stone supporting four columns, over which is a canopy or roof, the whole being placed on a pediment of granite. Upon the architraves of the canopy are cut the Arms of the United States and the City of Philadelphia, and on the opposite sides scholastic emblems. Within the canopy stands a figure in Italian marble, by the sculptor, Mr. Joseph A. Bailly, representing a young soldier standing at rest.

Upon the four marble tablets on the faces of the base, are the following inscriptions:

ERECTED A. D. 1869.

To perpetuate the memory and record the services of the pupils of this College, who in the then recent contest for the preservation of the American Union, Died that their country might live.

Fortunati omnes: Nulla dies unquam memori vos eximet avo."

"Especially I desire that by every proper means a pure attachment to our Republican Institutions shall be formed and fostered in the minds of the scholars."
